348pp , About the author and the book :: The historian Diana Wood has made a significant nuance to interpret the dialectic hidden in this puzzle consisting of politics and economics in his work ---- The medieval economic thought : An important difference between ideas and economic policy is that the former often anticipated the practice while the second happened in reverse ( 2003.289 ) . But even saying the tendency towards segregation , have not been able to erase the traces of the internal dynamics that informs politics and economy from its earliest beginnings . To the extent that the justification of rational choice , which is often used as currency conception of the neoliberal market , complaint itself an arbitrary relocation of democracy. Arguments of freedom , spontaneity and rationality in the market area at the same time refuse for allegedly impracticable in the political field are used. Thus , interest ( self , utilitarianism or pursuit of happiness are synonymous ) is considered the impulse that leads to an invisible hand to make the competitive market possible, even a debatable overall long-term balance between supply and demand . And yet this same argument belies the basis for the exercise of direct democracy . The right to decide for people , finding legitimate interest , rational choice , not worth to implement a policy of proximity and as a remedy argues the need for scaffolding and representational prosthesis.
